HANDWEAVING: History, Background and Origin

Weavings featured in El Paso Saddleblanket's wholesale catalog are not produced by Native Americans. For over 30 years EPSB has proudly specialized in quality handweaving, mostly from Indians in Mexico. For some products, we have often contracted the artistic skills of weavers in Guatemala, Ecuador, and India.

Handweaving, although starting 1000 years ago as a Nomadic craft in the Middle East, has almost always been a commercial endeavor - thus there is little recorded as to the origin of designs. Generally, traders have effected the majority of influence over patterns, color, and quality control. From the earliest experimentation with lines and angles, weavers have continually adapted and absorbed ideas from other cultures to upgrade the craft and increase marketability.

In the New World, between 1700-1800, Navajo Indians learned handweaving techniques from the Spanish and Pueblos. Until the late 1800's, the products were simple wearing blankets for themselves and Chief's blankets that they traded to the Plains Indians. What most people think of as Navajo design rugs were invented by early territorial traders using ideas from photographs of Persian carpets mixed with Pre-Columbian architectural designs from the Mitla Ruins in Mexico. Add in sheeps wool, imported dyes, and some entrepreneurial spirit, and the Navajo rug became a very marketable product. Today, the finest of Navajo rugs are very, very expensive.

El Paso Saddleblanket Company provides retailers with products that sell. Global trade demands that we bring to the market items of quality, economy, and above all, something the consumer feels good about acquiring. Your customers will recognize the traditional aspects of the designs and will love the way new elements of pattern and color are being used to fit modern decor. Our 2002 catalogs will continue to reintroduce popular old patterns in exciting new design combinations, sizes, and colors.

AUTHENTIC CASAS GRANDES POTS

Handcrafted in Northern Mexico Using Ancient Traditional Techniques

WHO STARTED IT?

Casas Grandes pottery was first produced about 1000 years ago in an area of Northern Mexico called Paquime. Although at first the pots were crude utilitarian vessels, their style, shape and quality transformed through trade with the Hohokam and Anazasi. Designs were inspired by the environment including bird and leaf patterns stylized by each artist.

Paquime pottery has some likeness to that of the Northern Pueblos, but is distinct in the unique feature of having very thin walls. The Paquime culture peaked sometime in the 13th or 14th century and then vanished.

WHO REVIVED IT?

In the middle part of this century, archeologists did considerable research into the early cultures of the Southwest. A young man who grew up near the Paquime ruins took great interest in the pottery shards of his ancestors. Now world renowned, Juan Quezada worked tirelessly for many years to not just bring back "what was," but to take the art to new heights. He shared his techniques with family and friends until the revival of pottery making became an industry for his village. This "industry" required a market. Members of the Quezada family brought truck load after truck load of their work to El Paso Saddleblanket Company.

While museums and snob galleries clamored for the pieces signed by Juan himself, El Paso Saddleblanket provided an outlet for the tens of thousands of pots produced by aspiring artists. Juan Quezada and his sisters still drop by El Paso Saddleblanket at least once a year to visit with Saddleblanket owners Dusty and Bonnie Henson. We are all a part of the phenomenon that a book now calls "The Miracle of Mata Ortiz." The book has drawn people from all over the world to El Paso and Paquime.

IS IT MARKETABLE?

Here we are in the year 2002 selling articles that are a revival of 14th century craft, and there is a tremendous market. Just like handweaving, handcrafted pottery is another art that people cherish and want to preserve.

El Paso Saddleblanket brings to the market affordable handmade pottery that sells well in all parts of the country. Our El Paso warehouse-wholesale showroom continuously features thousands of pots. We are currently able to ship two levels: Casas Grandes and a higher grade "Paquime."

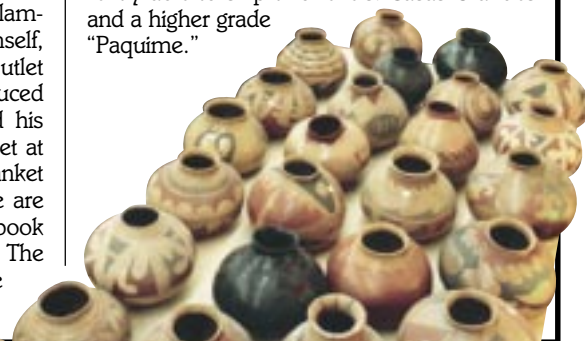

Photo only shows representative pieces. Designs, shapes and color tones vary. Shipped assorted. ALL pottery intended for decorative use - NOT for holding water or food.
